

Webbed feat?

If you think the worldwide web is a big job for Spiderman and a mouse is an unwelcome house guest, perhaps the time is right to acquire some new and very desirable skills.

One of Scotland's most popular computer courses is the ECDL (European Computer Driving Licence).

ECDL is a seven part learning programme which takes computer novices through basic concepts of Information Technology; using the computer and managing files; word processing; spreadsheets; databases; presentation as well as information and communications.

This is an ideal course for people who would like to learn these skills to benefit their work or just for general interest. The ECDL is an internationally recognised qualification of computer competency but you don't need formal qualifications to start learning.

People can sign up for the ECDL course at centres all over Scotland and take each module at their own pace – with tutor support and assistance.

To find out about ECDL courses in your area go to the Course Search page or call the ILA Scotland helpline free on 0808 100 1090.
